About the Public Lending Right (PLR) Program

“We trust that the Public Lending Right program will become an ever more effective instrument in upgrading the annual income of Canadian writers and in recognizing their major contribution to our cultural development and to our quality of life, which at times we take too much for granted.”

– Flora MacDonald, former Minister of Communications, at a 1987 ceremony presenting the first PLR cheques

Purpose of the Public Lending Right Commission

The Public Lending Right (PLR) Commission’s mandate is to increase the revenues and improve the financial situation of Canadian writers and to give public recognition to their important contribution to protecting Canada’s cultural identity. It makes payments to Canadian authors for the presence of their books catalogued in Canadian public libraries, according to the PLR program’s eligibility criteria. Authors have now registered a remarkable 70,090 eligible books with the PLR Commission.

Background

After nearly forty years of lobbying – primarily during the late 1970’s and early 80’s – Canada’s national writers’ organizations convinced the federal government to fund a PLR program. With the support of the Canada Council for the Arts, a committee of writers, publishers and librarians designed and implemented the PLR program in 1986. In fact, the work of the national associations was so impressive that the founding documents of the PLR state that these associations should be entrusted with the program’s administration. Canada is one of 27 countries to have implemented such a program. In 1992, in the Status of the Artist Act, the Government of Canada recognized “the importance to artists that they be compensated for the use of their works, including the public lending of them.”

The PLR Commission is made up of representatives of national organizations of writers, librarians, translators and publishers. The majority of members are authors. The Commission is responsible for setting the general policies of the program, and an executive committee carries out these policies. In 2007-2008, both the Commission and the Executive Committee were chaired by playwright David Copelin. The PLR Commission has four full-time staff and operates under the administrative aegis of the Canada Council for the Arts. Funding for the PLR program comes from the federal government through the Department of Canadian Heritage.

How the PLR program works

Authors must register their titles with the Commission. Works of fiction, poetry, drama, children’s literature, general non-fiction and scholarly books are eligible. Ineligible categories include how-to books, guide books, bibliographies, compilations and textbooks. The Commission's database of registered eligible titles is checked annually against the holdings of a selection of public libraries (six catalogues for each official language group).

PLR payments are determined by the library sampling. It is the title's presence in one or more of these libraries that produces a payment. The number of copies found in a library is not taken into account. Each year the available budget determines both the amount paid each time a book is found, as well as the maximum amount an author can earn.

Brief History of the Public Lending Right (PLR) Program

- 1946 The world's first library compensation program is developed in Denmark.
- 1949 The Canadian Authors Association starts to discuss the possibility of a Public Lending Right program in Canada.
- 1951 The Massey-Lévesque Royal Commission on National Development in the Arts, Letters and Sciences reports on two Special Studies it had requested in the subject of Canadian literature. The two authors of the studies, reporting respectively on English- and French-language literature, are in agreement: "Neither in French nor in English have we yet a truly national literature."
- 1973 The Writers' Union of Canada begins to lobby for a PLR program.
- 1977 The Canada Council sets up the Payment for Public Use Committee to examine the creation of a PLR program.
- 1982 The Applebaum-Hébert Committee recommends that the government establish a program to provide payment for library use.
- 1986 The PLR program is established by a Cabinet decision in March 1986, with an initial budget of $3 million allocated to it by the Treasury Board Secretariat. Canada becomes the 13th country in the world to develop a PLR program.
- 1988 The PLR Commission's Constitution and Bylaws are developed and approved.
- 1992 The Status of the Artist Act is passed into law, and includes among its general principles "the importance to artists that they be compensated for the use of their works, including the public lending of them."
- 1996 The PLR Commission and the Canada Council for the Arts sign an administrative agreement to clarify the relationship between the two organizations.

- 1999 Canada hosts the 3rd annual PLR International Conference.
- 2005 The PLR Commission and the Canada Council for the Arts sign a revised administrative arrangement to clarify the relationship between the two organizations.

Chair's Report

David Copelin

During the past year, the Public Lending Right (PLR) Commission has seen its constituency of published writers grow at its usual annual rate of 3-4%. Despite the fact that our funding has not kept pace with that growth, Canadian writers keep writing and publishing. We writers are hard people to discourage, and writing itself is an optimistic activity.

I was reminded of this last September, when Executive Secretary Michelle Legault and I represented Canada at the International Public Lending Right Conference in Paris. Mingling with our colleagues from the other twenty-three countries with PLR programs, I was struck by the great number of PLR programs run by bureaucrats rather than actual professional writers, publishers, and librarians, as ours is. There is a great diversity in approaches to the idea of Public Lending Right, to be sure; but a program that privileges the real creators, publishers, and guardians of writing by living authors, as Canada's does, seems to have its priorities straight.

Whenever I talk about the PLR program, Canadians are delighted to learn that it exists. They don't think it's a frill – but then, Canadians think of themselves as citizens, not merely “taxpayers.” They agree that writers should be paid fairly for their labours, and they understand how hard-earned a writer's dollars are. As we do with much else in this country, we may take the PLR program for granted, but it is as precarious as our civil liberties and as precious. This is because the PLR is an instrument of civilization. It is a recognition that published books matter in this world, and not just to their creators. The freedom to write, the freedom to publish, and the freedom to read are tightly intertwined, so when a government shows its appreciation by paying published authors for their works found in public libraries, it is expressing gratitude that its borders contain gifted artists of the written word, that these artists work hard and achieve much, and that Canada and the world would be immeasurably poorer without them.

Funding is an ongoing problem for us. Our constituency expands at the rate of literary creation while our dollar support stays more or less constant, with a few spikes here and there in our 22-year history. In practice, this means that more authors are paid by the PLR program, but they share a stagnant pool of dollars, each one getting less than an ideal amount. Nobody disputes this unpleasant fact. However, government priorities and interests shift with prevailing political winds. We want a reliable and growing source of funds for author payments, but so far, we have not achieved it. We are brainstorming about this, trying to master the bureaucratic rough-and-tumble, and doing what we can to provoke ministerial interest and encourage vocal championship of our plight from many directions. In terms of the amount of money consecrated to paying writers, we are in the lower middle of the list of international PLR programs. I hope that our national pride, if nothing else, may help stop and possibly even reverse Canada's slow descent down that list.

That said, we are grateful for the recent increase of $700,000 in our annual budget, but we are dissatisfied with the amount. Though we certainly appreciate the gesture, it is simply inadequate to deal with the objective growth in the program. In a time when brutal cuts are being made elsewhere, we understand the situation. But we are writers, people who tell particular truths, and we are not going to pretend satisfaction for the sake of decorum. We will take the money, and agitate for more, so that the PLR program does not become a mere cultural token, a relic of good intentions defeated by narrow “bottom-line” thinking. Canada is better than that. Canada has been wiser than that.

“The old order changeth, giving place to new,” as is the way of the world. This is a real time of transition for the Commission. The estimable Michelle Legault has been confirmed as our Executive Secretary (and did I ever heave a sigh of relief when that appointment became official!). In addition, several long-serving members are retiring from the Commission, and I want to take this opportunity to salute them, to thank them for their years of good service, and to wish them well. They are: Louise Halfe (Public Lending Right Commission), Andreas Schroeder (The Writers’ Union of Canada), Douglas Smith (League of Canadian Poets), and Paul Whitney (Canadian Library Association). You will be greatly missed.

As my tenure as Chair of the Public Lending Right Commission ends, I leave the organization in the more than capable hands of the new Chair. I shall continue to serve on the Executive Committee (as Past Chair) for another two years.

Finally, and let this be my farewell: Despite our ongoing disappointment with our funding, despite our impatience with passive (and sometimes active) aggression from various quarters, if you ask me, “Are we at the PLRC having fun yet?” my answer is a resounding “Yes!”.

Executive Secretary's Report

Michelle Legault

This has been an exciting year for the Public Lending Right (PLR) Commission. In 2007-2008, the PLR participated in the Canada Council for the Arts' Strategic Planning process and secured an ongoing $700,000 increase, undertook a policy-writing project, introduced a communications plan, moved to a new division within the Canada Council for the Arts and attended the 7th PLR International Conference in Paris.

In addition, the PLR delivered $9,115,095 in payments to authors in 1,688 communities in Canada and 337 communities abroad. The average payment of $570 represents compensation to authors for the access people around the country enjoy to Canadian literature in Canadian public libraries.

Increase to the PLR Budget

In 2007, the Canada Council for the Arts launched a strategic planning process. The convergence of many factors, such as the end of the Council's current corporate plan and the allocation of an additional $30 million to the Council's base budget, provided an ideal opportunity for the Council to review its role and relationship to the arts and the public. The goal of the Council's new strategic plan was to establish directions for 2008-2011.

The plan was approved by the Board of the Council at its October 2007 meeting. To "operationalize" the Strategic Plan, the staff of the Council, including PLR staff, developed an Action Plan and budget recommendations which were approved by the Board of the Council in December 2007. Among these recommendations was a $700,000 increase to the PLR's budget.

We were, on the one hand, delighted by the $700,000 increase because it will help to raise the payments to be shared by authors in February 2009. On the other hand, the PLR realizes that $700,000 does little to satisfy the demand on the PLR program and the challenges faced by Canadian authors.

The PLR program faces a significant challenge. Each year, approximately 4,000 new books are registered. Unfortunately, the budget for author payments has not grown at the same rate. In 1987, an author received $400 for a book found in all libraries in the sample. In 2008, this amount was just $268.

Our objective in 2008 will be to develop a plan to ensure that the $700,000 increase has the maximum impact for authors.

Policies for the PLR

In these times of increased accountability, the PLR must ensure that all policies, procedures and standards used by the organization are properly documented. Written, approved and sanctioned policies ensure that the PLR operates with consistency and clarity of purpose. With that in mind, we began drafting policies for the PLR and presenting them to the members of the PLR Commission. The process of recording our policies ensures that the PLR captures corporate memory and the wisdom of decisions and discussions recorded in the PLR Commission's minutes.

PLR Communications Plan

The communications initiatives we undertook this year were directly linked to securing additional funds for the PLR and increasing the PLR's profile among authors, publishers, librarians and parliamentarians.

We developed a new PLR brochure and distributed it to libraries, publishers and municipal arts Councils and events. In addition, text about the PLR appeared in many writers' associations' newsletters and web sites. We also initiated contact with the members of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage to make the PLR better known.

7th PLR International Conference

The 7th PLR International Conference was held in Paris, from September 6 to 8, 2007. It was hosted by Sofia, the Société française des intérêts des auteurs de l'écrit, which was previously known as the long-standing Société des gens de lettres, established during the 19th century. The conference was held at Sofia's administration centre, the Hôtel de Massa, an 18th century stone mansion which originally stood on the Champs Élysées.

Representatives of every country with a PLR program were invited to address the conference on the current status of PLR in their respective countries. There are 27 countries throughout the world (mostly in Europe) that have PLR programs. Twenty-three of these countries were present at the conference.

What stood out in these national reports was the diversity of administrative models for the PLR programs world-wide. Some programs include payments for books used in educational institutions and others provide payments for audiovisual material. In other countries, part of the PLR budget is paid to publishers. Some PLR programs do not make direct payments to authors – instead, payments are made to collecting societies which redistribute the funds through grant programs or pension and housing allowances for authors.

Undoubtedly, 2008-2009 will pose many challenges for the PLR. We must manage our new funds, work towards further recognition of the vital importance of the PLR and come to an understanding of how to deal with the program's growth, while ensuring that our payments continue to have an impact on the lives of Canadian authors.

I would like to take the opportunity to thank the PLRC members for their dedicated service. Andreas Schroeder, Douglas Smith and Paul Whitney have completed their terms on the Commission as of June 2008. Andreas Schroeder, who represents The Writer's Union of Canada, was among the founders of the PLR and served as chair from 1986 to 1989. Douglas Smith, who represents the League of Canadian Poets, began his term on the PLR in 1988 and served as chair from 1995 to 1997. Paul Whitney, representing the Canadian Library Association, has served two terms with the PLRC, beginning in 2000. Their commitment to the PLR is truly admirable. In fact, together, they contributed over 50 years of service to the PLR Commission!

Finally, a thank you to the PLR staff: Danielle Guindon, Rachelle Lanoue and Benoît Rollin. I have the honour of working with a tireless, dedicated and enthusiastic team.
